Dedication date: 1926

Subject notes: Shortly after Washington was elected President in 1789, he decided to tour the United States in order to better understand the condition of the country, its makeup and culture, and to give the citizens of the young republic a chance to meet their first President. The duties of office delayed a trip to the South until the spring of 1791. His larger than life status made his visits important events for communities and the places he stayed became historically significant.

There are several stone markers across North Carolina that commemorate President Washington's tour of the southern states in 1791. Notable among them are the George Washington Tree Marker <sup>[6]</sup> in Hampstead outside Wilmington, George Washington and Henry Clay Marker <sup>[7]</sup> in Wilmington, and a stone marker at Guilford Courthouse <sup>[8]</sup>.

Location: The George Washington Boulder is located on N.C. Highway 150 directly across from Reeds Elementary School in the Community of Reeds near Lexington.

Landscape: The marker sits in a lawn area next to a home.
