Primary Source: Boundary Between North Carolina and the Cherokee Nation, 1767

The first documented treaty between the Cherokee and North Carolina occurred in 1730. Sir Alexander Cuming met with the Cherokees in the Middle region town of Nequassese, located in modern day Macon County, North Carolina. Cuming selected “Moyto” to be emperor of the Cherokee nation, thus placing the Cherokee under the jurisdiction of King George II. Subsequent to 1730, other treaties were invoked between the Cherokee and North Carolina where promises were made; Cherokee-occupied land was ceded to North Carolina, and promises were broken.

This Western Boundary Agreement of 1767 between North Carolina and the Cherokee Nation was a further attempt to re-establish peace between the Indians and colonists that resulted from white settlers encroaching on Cherokee land. The original Agreement did not contain line breaks or paragraphs. Those have been added to assist the reader. A scanned image of the original Agreement is available via North Carolina Digital Collections.
