^[2]The Carolina Charter Tercentenary Commission was established by the 1959 General Assembly ^[3] in order to plan for observations of the 300th anniversary of the signing of the Carolina charter ^[4] in 1663. The celebration centered on educational and public observances of the first century of the colony's official existence. Pamphlets, brochures, and leaflets were prepared for various age levels. A 30-minute motion picture was produced, as was a one-act historic opera (The Sojourner and Mollie Sinclair ^[5], by Carlisle Floyd), and a symphony (North State). A mobile Museum of History toured the state displaying historical artifacts. A literary competition, religious commemorations, a commemorative postage stamp ^[6], and local county observances were important components of the celebration.

One enduring contribution of the Tercentenary Commission was the construction of a building to house the State Archives ^[7], a museum of history, and other historical agencies. The groundbreaking ceremony for such an edifice took place in October 1963. The commission also sparked a new edition of The Colonial Records of North Carolina ^[8]; in 1961 the North Carolina Colonial Records Project came into being, and the first of the project's nine volumes was published for the tercentenary in 1963.
