Glebes were plots of ground designated for the use of clergymen <sup>[3]</sup> assigned to a parish in England or the British colonies in America before 1776. The glebe was considered a part of the cleric's stipend, and he could farm, rent out, or otherwise use the land for his maintenance. At a meeting of the vestry <sup>[4]</sup> of St. Paul's Parish in Chowan County <sup>[5]</sup> on 5 May 1708, it was agreed that 500 acres that had been purchased was a glebe. In 1762, however, the North Carolina Assembly directed that every parish should have a glebe <sup>[6]</sup>, and it specified the buildings that each should contain. This law directed that except for normal use, the property should be maintained at public expense.

After the American Revolution <sup>[7]</sup>, unoccupied glebe land attracted squatters and speculators and in some cases resulted in legal action to settle claims. Some churches, including St. Thomas Church in Bath <sup>[8]</sup>, still hold title to ancient glebe property.
