^[2]Hoke v. Henderson, a case decided by the North Carolina Supreme Court ^[3] in 1834 in an opinion by Chief Justice Thomas Ruffin, held that state offices were a form of property, and that officeholders were therefore protected by the state constitution ^[4] against arbitrary removal by the legislature ^[5]. Although the legal argument was eventually rejected by the courts of every other state and by the federal courts, Hoke remained the law in North Carolina throughout the nineteenth century, being often reaffirmed. In the late 1890s, as political power shifted from the Democrats ^[6] to the "Fusion" of Republicans and Populists ^[7], then back to the Democrats, Hoke was invoked to protect officeholders against ouster. Reliance on that precedent by two justices of the state supreme court became, in fact, one of the grounds for their impeachment in 1901 ^[8]. Although finally overruled in 1903, Hoke remains a classic statement of judicial independence.
