Lovejoy Academy was established in 1842, when Jefferson Madison Lovejoy [3] decided to open his Classical and English School in Raleigh [4]. Lovejoy's school occupied an existing school building on Burke Square a few blocks northwest of the State Capitol [5] building, the site of the present-day Governor's Mansion [6]. Although the school operated under a variety of names before becoming known as Lovejoy Academy in 1852, it soon became known as one of the state's best private boys' schools.

Students of Jefferson Lovejoy recalled his passionate devotion to Greek, Latin, and English literature Virgil's Aeneid rand Samuel Augustus Mitchell's Ancient Geography (8) were among his favorite texts. Teaching by having students read lessons aloud from their books while he corrected their mistakes, Lovejoy had "a formidable reputation for severity," especially on occasions when he encountered the "three vices of slothfulness, deception, and intemperance." One of his former pupils, Kemp Plummer Battle 🕫 (later president of the University of North Carolina [10]), recalled that Lovejoy was quick to deliver hard swats to the hand to any student caught breaking his rules.

The Civil War [11] dealt a severe blow to Lovejoy Academy, as a number of the older boys joined the military and hard economic times prevented some parents from continuing their sons' enrollment. Despite these problems, the school remained open until near the end of the war. When Lovejoy died in 1877, a Raleigh newspaper noted that few other men had done as much for the cause of education in North Carolina
