The Poole Bills ^[3], also called "Poole Monkey Bills," were a series of attempts in the 1920s by General Assembly ^[4] member D. Scott Poole ^[5] to outlaw the teaching of evolution in state-supported schools. If the Poole Bill were passed, it would have required that all teachers in the state sign a pledge stating that they believed "in the being of Almighty God" and ensured a prison sentence for any teacher convicted of teaching evolution in a state school.

Inspired by actions of the Tennessee legislature that precipitated the infamous Scopes Trial ^[6] of 1920, and backed by fundamentalist forces centered around a committee of 100 churchmen of the North Carolina Presbyterian Synod, Poole introduced his first bill in 1925 and saw it defeated by a narrow margin. In February 1927 Poole's bill was reintroduced and defeated in committee by a margin of 25 to 11 after a rousing speech by Paul J. Ranson ^[7], a law student at the University of North Carolina in Chapel Hill ^[8]. Victory for the bill's opponents was widely attributed to some presentations and debates in Charlotte ^[9] sponsored by former students of Horace Williams ^[10] (1858-1940), the controversial philosophy professor at UNC-Chapel Hill.
